LIGHTNING NEVER STRIKES IN THE SAME PLACE TWICE... OR DOES IT?

Déjà Vu by Susan Giles shows that not everyone is always as they seem...

“Déjà Vu is a novel that emerged out of one of my previously published short stories,” explains Susan. “I always thought it had potential to be a good novel and I considered expanding it in several ways and on numerous occasions, but it never felt sufficient or the right time. However, a personal experience similar to that of the protagonist Catherine changed all that...”

Combatting the serious and all-too-real issue of rape within a relationship, Déjà Vu is a contemporary twist on the traditional love story. When Catherine’s partner, Alexander, sexually assaults her, she flees to Cornwall to be alone and to consider her future.

Catherine experiences a rare feeling of déjà vu when she meets a fisherman named Christopher Armstrong. Prompted by this sentiment, she allows a relationship to begin, with the intention of it being platonic. Armstrong, however, has other ideas. As Catherine finds herself more attracted to the Cornish fisherman, she discovers that she still harbours feelings for her first love – a young fisherman called Christopher... Upon discovering that this modern-day Christopher is much less than the gentleman she initially thought he was, Catherine finds herself completely isolated – and in mortal danger...

“Although Déjà Vu is essentially a romance and relationship novel, it departs from the formulaic norm of the genre. The topic of rape is regularly in the news and it is an issue that needs addressing,” explains Susan.

SUSAN GILES has gained a degree in English Literature and History from the Open University, as well as publishing stories in both the UK and the US. She previously worked as a technical author.
